One day a little waif of seven, having committed every other sin he could think of, proceeded to strangle himself with a rope. He was under treatment at the time in the hospital, for a disease which was entirely the result of dirt. The nurse coming suddenly into the room, found him stark and black! Hastily summoning aid, she cut the rope through, and began to take measures for restoring the child to consciousness. How unhappy he must have been --poor little fellow, she said at last to the doctor who was helping her. The doctor was watching his patient: and he had just assured himself that that small personage enjoying the drama of resuscitation, was prolonging it by continuing to execute the movements of a person in extremis, long after such manifestations were necessary or natural. In this dramatic...
