Men are forbidden, in this kingdom, to grow tobacco on their lands. This, one would think, ought not to be. The eause is, that the excise duty on tobacco yields a great deal of money; and, if the tobacco were cultivated here, instead of being brought from abroad, it is evident that it would be impossible to collect an excise duty from it; because, being planted in every man s garden, and in every field, or corner of a field, those who use tobacco would provide themselves with it without paying duty; as, indeed, some men do now, in spite of the law. We have seen, in letter IT, that it was Cromwell, and his execrable villains, who first invented the.Ernst . We have seen that it was they who fitst made the people pay taxes on tobacco. The duty has remained from that day to this; and though this statute law relative to this matter is not in accordance with natural justice, but a gross violation of that justice, still it shows that those who govern us give us this signal proof, that they do not regard property in land sufficient to warrant the proprietor in thing what he liMet with it; that they do not regard him as having an absolute proprietorship; that they deem it just and proper that he should hold the land, subject to such restraints, charges, and conditions, as the legislature...
